She Murdered Me With Science* published by Flying Pen Press
Debut pulp-noir novel combines classic mystery with future vision

DENVER — Flying Pen Press announced the publication today of She Murdered me with Science, the debut science fiction–mystery novel by author David Boop.

In 1953, disgraced scientist Noel Glass works as a private investigator to redeem himself for a deadly mistake that cost the lives of six people, including his fiancée. When a rich recluse offers information that Glass has been framed, Glass tries to clear his name while challenging a secret organization bent on using his own discovery for world domination. Who can Glass trust when everyone is keeping secrets? His Japanese assistant Wan Lee? The sultry blues singer Merlot Sterling? The man-mountain Vincent Richmond? From the desolate streets of Industry City, Colorado, to a showdown in Chicago, Glass finds death at every turn. He must discover the self he lost fourteen years ago and face off against the one ghost he swore he laid to rest.

She Murdered Me with Science blends detective noir with the pulp science fiction of the Forties and Fifties. During his quest, Glass meets such historical figures as J. Edgar Hoover, DNA scientist James Watson, and photojournalist Art Shay. The story interweaves true events including the Cold War and the Trumble Park Riots with a fictional Armageddon. Real forensics and weird science collide in this page-turner.

Author David Boop is a Denver-based writer of short fiction, novels, comics and films.
